AUTHOR'S / SPONSOR'S STATEMENT OF INTENT

The University of Houston-Victoria was created at a time when upper-division universities were established to provide access to bachelor's and master's degrees by offering junior, senior and graduate level courses. These upper-level institutions, by design, were commuter schools with undergraduate enrollment limited to transfer students from area community schools.

While the upper-level model was a good starting point, eventually it was uniformly abandoned through a process called "downward expansion," or the lifting of restrictions for the admission of freshman and sophomore students. It became clear that the upper-level model did not allow the university to reach its full potential in terms of numbers of students, diversity of students, richness of learning and efficient use of faculty and facilities.

Only four upper-division universities remain in the nation, the University of Houston-Victoria being one of them.

H.B. 1056 expands the University of Houston-Victoria from an upper-division university to a four-year university.
